

I would like to comment on an overwhelming centralization of one particular aspect of the media.

It has come to my attention that over 95% of all complaints of indeceny filed with the FCC are coming from one web site, organised by one organisation in Los Angeles, CA.

Since we already have the vast majority of our television produced in this area it seems that this is a further erosion of local content and control of media.

I would ask the FCC to consider actions that would limit the amount of influence one organisation can have on its complaint procedure. We cannot, for example, be sure that the organisation concerned, the Parents Television Council, are not filtering the information submitted to their site? How can we be sure that all the complaints submitted are from valid concerned citizens?

It is my belief that if organizations like this persist in their actions then the FCC should consider only allowing indecency complaints via US Mail rather than allow any email to the current complaint address be considered a valid complaint.
